Sourcing a vast range of products from multiple vendors is inefficient and time consuming

The complex nature of procuring industrial supplies means your staff are probably wasting a lot of their time and your budget. First in searching and sourcing a list of products, and then in trying to negotiate with individual suppliers.

Fragmented supply base

Random negotiating

Searching and sourcing

Spot buying

Employees contact multiple suppliers to find all the products they need, often wasting time and diluting your buying power.

With multiple stakeholders negotiating across the organisation and individual supplier relationships, you have reduced control over the prices that are achieved.

Time is wasted on searching a wide range of websites and catalogues as staff are not sure where to find the items needed for the job.

Emergency buys and one-time purchases outside framework agreements drive cost inefficiencies.
